The Detroit Tigers stadium was originally green.

It wasn’t called Tiger Stadium at the time, it was Navin Field, but yes, the interior of the old ballpark was green. The walls, the bleachers, the box seats, every chair, and every counter-top was green in the ballpark until the mid-1970s. That’s when the team decided to paint it blue, the color it remained until 1999 when it hosted its last major league game. The team never gave an official reason for the paint job, but it was thought to be to help hitters and fielders pick up the baseball better.